The Womens Health Initiative, which was responsible for conducting the federal clinical tests on estrogen and progestin pills, to determine if taking these drugs heightens the risk of contracting different breast cancers, came back with results that were rather astounding. Their outcome translated into this: taking estrogen and progestin pills over a period of one year or longer, or under any prolonged usages, ultimately will increase the risk of contracting breast cancer twofold. The panel experts also concluded that the risk of contracting breast cancer returned to the normal roughly two years after the patient discontinued usages of the hormonal therapy drugs.

Are Popular Prescribed Menopause Drugs Worth the Risk?

Other findings of the panel have also concluded that the dramatic drop in the rates of breast cancer reports of women who are over the age forty five have been reduced in recent years because more women are seeking natural menopause remedies to treat the symptoms of their menopause with remedies that allow them to sidestep the heightened risks of breast cancer that are prevalent with using the popular prescribed hormonal therapy drugs.

In reality, any drug that is intended to treat the symptoms of menopause, but that which also places the patient at heightened risks of serious illnesses such as cancer, is just not worth the risk for many women.

Natural Menopause Remedies Offer Ideal Alternative

For those who are seeking an alternative method of treatment, there is thankfully an abundance of quality and affordable natural menopause remedies currently on the market. Many of them use potent, clinically proven ingredients that are able to effectively combat all of the known symptoms of menopause, yet at the same time, they do not have any adverse or known side effects, they do not require a prescription from a doctor, they are more cost effective, and most importantly, they do not place the consumer at higher risks of contracting breast cancers.
